“Factory manufacture robs us of a special something: contemplation.”
- from Craeft: An Inquiry Into the Origins and True Meaning of Traditional Crafts by Alexander Langlands

GBW Members:

In the throes of winter, and it’s what I spend more of my time in: contemplation. Out the window I watch the dreamy way that snow coats the fir branches, quietly thumping down as the day warms, and creating high contrast in our view-shed: stark white against forest greens against cerulean blue skies. Winter is a time of work for me, and a time of contemplation.

I read a lot too. The above quote is from the new book Craeft: An Inquiry Into the Origins and True Meaning of Traditional Crafts by Alexander Langlands. He is a guy who spends his time learning the “old ways” of doing things (like building a dry-stone wall or milling flour) and his enthusiasm—along with the depths he goes to—creates an interesting read. We are a group that also celebrates “craeft”. We engage in books with our hands.

The Feature article this issue is on a small and active group of book artists in the North Carolina area. What I really like about them is the diversity within their group. Diversity of knowledge, skills, years. This brings new inspirations, new ideas, it stretches our thoughts to new considerations. They share with each other in a community of cooperation.

We hear from regular contributors Iris Nevins on marbling papers and Pamela Wood on a construction zone in Paris. Longtime GBW member Dorothy Africa shares a photo of an interesting detail she found on a book at work, and her examination and explanation of it.

It’s so interesting what all these folks have to say. In my contemplative way, I need to ask: what do you have to say? Drop me a line, I just like hearing from you all. I’m still looking for a correspondent for the Book Arts field. There is so much happening! Contact me if you are interested in helping out, the commitment is small.

I also note that several of our members have solo or are in group shows, or curated an exhibiton. I encourage you to enjoy an afternoon of what is available out there to view. The world of “books” is growing tentacles into other arenas, and exploring new ways of seeing or experiencing our favorite objects. Right now in my area, the Denver Art Museum has a show featuring book collector Xiaoze Xie, and his collection of banned books from China. And did you see who is speaking at the DeGolyer Conference? Our own Bexx Caswell-Olson!

New York Chapter Chair Celine Lombardy reports:
We are pleased to be pairing with Legacy Press to host lectures and book signings with their authors as new books are released. And the library at the New York Academy of Medicine has a new Head of Preservation, Scott Devine, who has re-opened that venue for Guild workshops and lectures. We hosted our first Legacy Press Lecture there in December.

Dr. Pablo Alvarez spoke on The Art & Science of Healing: From Antiquity to the Renaissance on December 12, at the New York Academy of Medicine.

Dear Members,

I would like to wish you all a happy and healthy new year!

By the time this letter finds you, we will be well into 2018. I am very excited for what the coming year has in store for our organization. The jury process for FORMATION, our next traveling exhibition, is already underway (the deadline for submission is March 1). The exhibition will open at the Minnesota Center for Book Arts in June, and will be up through the ‘Standards of Excellence Seminar’ in October. Presenters and tours for ‘Standards’ will be announced soon. Minneapolis has a fantastic book arts community, and I’m really excited that the Guild will have the opportunity to visit the area.

Many Thanks, Bexx Caswell-Olson, President, Guild of Book Workers

WINTerset, IA
through April 15
This exhibition features an unusual mix of mediums coming together to focus on a style of fabric with a rich and little known history—and many bindings are featured. The binding involvement began with a gift from Janine Vangool, the publisher and designer of Feed Sacks: The Colourful History of a Frugal Fabric, written by Linzee Kull McCray. Ms. Vangool shared fifteen unbound copies of the book with different binders who were tasked with creating unique covers based on the contents. The result are a variety of bindings using various covering materials, bookbinding structures and ornamentation techniques. (Editor's note: a must see!)

Triangle Book Arts is an informal network of people in the “Triangle” area of North Carolina who are interested in book arts by its broadest definition — which includes bookbinding, printmaking, paper arts, comics, zines, and artists’ books. The group coalesced in 2011 after a series of events sponsored by the libraries of UNC - Chapel Hill and Duke University, called Book + Art: Artists’ Books at Duke + UNC - Chapel Hill. These events included exhibitions of artists’ books from both libraries’ collections; a reading featuring four local book artists held at the Joseph C. Sloane Art Library at UNC; a lecture by photographer and book artist Bea Nettles at Duke; and a juried exhibition of book works by students from both universities.

When those of us who attended multiple events started to recognize each other, we began a conversation about the need for a local network to share news and skills. Casual conversation led to initial meetings at the Chapel Hill Public Library, which led to the founding of the Triangle Area Book Arts listserv, maintained on Google Groups. Since then, TBA has grown from about a dozen members to a Google Group of almost 200, although the number of active members is about 25 to 30. Some are professionals in a book arts-related field (letterpress printers, teachers, conservators, librarians), some are artists in other media (painters, graphic designers, ceramicists, writers, photographers), while others are enthusiasts from a wide range of other fields (lawyers, as well as professionals in pharmaceuticals, engineering, and government policy).

Originally envisioned as a means to share news about book arts events, TBA quickly expanded. Soon members taught free workshops to each other, shared information about ordering supplies, met to swap materials and socialize, began outreach to spread the word about book arts, and considered options to exhibit work. Although not organized by Triangle Book Arts, an exhibition in the Fall of 2011 at the Ackland Museum Store in Chapel Hill called “Books & Broadsides” featured work by members (and future members) of the group.

Since then, the group has produced or participated in a number of exhibitions, including “Code X” at the Carrack Gallery in Durham, (December, 2013); “Library of Possibility” at Daylight Project Space in Hillsborough (September, 2014); and “Upcycle!”, a themed show featuring books made with reused materials, at East Carolina University (May through August, 2015). A show held in collaboration with fellow groups from Asheville and Chattanooga, “Renaissance” traveled to venues in all three locations; the Triangle show was held at FRANK Gallery, Chapel Hill.
Hill. A new show called “re(f)use” will be on view at Artspace in Raleigh from January 26 to March 3, (see ad in this issue for more details.)

From 2012 to 2017 we held monthly workshops and other events. The diverse backgrounds and areas of expertise in the group allow everyone to offer something unique. Our workshops have focused on traditional techniques such as making paste paper, constructing specific types of boxes, and specific printmaking processes, as well as on technology skills such as using InDesign and successfully photographing work. Non-workshop events have included field trips to local studios such as Supergraphic printmaking studio in Durham, or to special collections at Duke and UNC libraries to spend time with inspiring books. Members also do outreach in a variety of ways: teaching in their studios, offering public workshops and talks at TBA exhibitions, and writing about book arts. In fact, an article in Volume 45 of the GBW Journal is by TBA member Peggy Seeger.

As an informal group with no dues or membership requirements other than interest, Triangle Book Arts has depended entirely on the generosity of its members for their time, enthusiasm, and skills regarding its programming and its very existence. That creates a sense of camaraderie and collegiality, but it also comes with limitations. We don’t have a physical space to call our own, so the logistics of organizing workshops can be a scramble at the mercy of limited options. Without an organized way of handling money, we’ve been limited in our efforts to bring outside experts to teach workshops. And without the skeleton of a defined organization, we have been, by nature, somewhat disorganized. We look forward to seeing which way that skeleton might change shape in the future.

Construction zones touch every place on this planet at one time or another. Some places have more than others, making travel very frustrating. We sum it up to progress and hope it quickly goes away.

The last place I expected construction was on a bullet point item on my Paris tourist list. Arriving at the gates of the 12th century building in Paris, Musee Cluny was instant splendor to crest fallen disappointment: “Closed For Renovation until 2020”. How to move on? In the usual way, I started walking to another place. Until I noticed: Signage. And not the usual construction zone kind. I’ve since learned that warning signs date back to the Romans and Pompeii. Protection of property and warning of harm is a timeless duty. In fact in medieval times, when the Musee Cluny was brand new, red flags were used to warn of areas of plague in cities. Seems us humans have the trait to stumble upon danger. Back to my moment in front of the Cluny, I noticed the exciting construction zone graphics. Here was a wonderful blend of whimsy and civil duty. Rather than chain link fence, tarp and yellow tape, there was a wooden fence completely surrounding the work zone. And on it was wonderful calligraphy, along with cartoons!

I followed the black and white lettering, the brush strokes directly painted on the fence. A grand calligraphy scale that would have been used on paper or parchment, this is sign painting that keeps the feel of the building alive and effectively signals medieval times. Looking closer as I walked, I was met by construction workers in cartoon form having fun with their job of moving and building new places for the precious objects of the museum. A worker in hard hat carrying a stained glass window. Another hoisting a column piece over his head, as if saying “it’s on the move”. Two more workers were taking a break on top of the hand lettered “T” and offering an antique rose of affection to the other including the graphic accents showing joy and affection.

When the end of the fence came there was a final work of joy: a construction worker down low is holding the cable so that a suspended worker can put the site details (in sign form) in place on the fence.

Yes, unpredictability is a key component of an artist’s life. Staying in this playful moment at the Musee Cluny allowed me to enjoy this oldest of Paris buildings while marveling at the pride to make a mundane, boring construction zone into a fun filled fence that with few words said all that was necessary. This level of graphic design is not often found with this level of detail and playfulness, including other sites in Paris and definitely not in my local construction zones at home. I guess this reaffirms the cliché: most everything is better in Paris!

A Stitch in Time

In A Millennium of the Book: Production, Design and Illustration in Manuscript and Print, 900-1900 (1994), there is a contributed article by Nicholas Pickwoad entitled “Onward and downward: how binders coped with the printing press before 1800” (pp. 61-106) which has now become a classic article in its own right. It provides a survey of the ways binders sought to speed up and abbreviate book bindings as “… the binding trade fac[ed] the realities of increasing demand and financial pressure, sometimes with ingenuity, sometimes with shoddy work and sometimes with straightforward deception. ..” (p. 61). In the thirty plus years I spent doing conservation and repair work in the Harvard Law School Library I came across many examples of all three of these.

As an instance of “ingenious” one example in particular has stuck with me over the years; an instance of “ingenious” not so much in the process of binding, but more in the line of disaster recovery. The binding is on a small octavo of 376 pages printed in Brescia, Italy in 1582, an edition of a treatise originally published in 1541 by the Spanish Dominican priest and theologian Domingo de Soto, 1494-1560, entitled Relectio de ratione tegendi, et detegendi secretum (a loose translation would be Reflections on the rationale for concealing, and revealing a secret). The treatise addresses the problems of dealing with crimes revealed in holy confession, and every priest must have had reason to seek its advice at some point, so it is hardly surprising that this treatise went through multiple editions and many printings.

As a practitioner’s hand book, however, it was not likely to merit a fancy binding. The Harvard Law School copy is in a vellum wrapper, now badly torn, laced through by the two sewing supports. It must have been sold with no wrapper at all, for a short title is lettered on the spine lining. The sewing is economical, but hardly “shoddy”. The manual was sure to be used frequently, so the sewing was packed, and two supports are certainly adequate for an octavo of 15 cm. though hardly generous.

Ingenuity must have been required by its binder however, and the circumstances can be sketched in by the remaining evidence on the lower sewing support. We might even add some imagined details to color the scene. Perhaps it was late, and there was not much candle left as the binder hurried to sew this last piece of the day’s work. He was using tanned supports, perhaps left over off cuts; a cheap but risky choice of support material which brought him to grief when the lower one snapped off just above the sewing line. What to do? Undoing all that packed sewing on so cheap a piece would cost him dearly. Perhaps he was tired, hungry, and his candle was burning low. Thinking quickly, he thinned and then trimmed one end of the piece of leather that had broken off to a blunt point, and laid it over the sewing below the break. He ran a vertical stitch of thread through the leather down over the stitching, and then back up through the sewing to emerge on the spine behind the sewing at the point of the break. With the sewing and the support thus secured and reconnected, he resumed sewing to finish off the piece as the candle guttered out. Clearly deception was not intended if the book was sold without a covering, and perhaps the person who bought it got a bit off the price. In any event this ingenious save is still visible, intact, and holding just over four centuries later. I admire the guy.

Thanks are due to the Harvard Law School Library, especially Ms. Mary Person, the rare books cataloger, for assistance with the bibliographical details, and for kindly supplying the pictures for this piece. The more fanciful details are my own, of course, as are any inadvertent errors about this volume from the library’s collection.

The Medieval Girdle Book

Margit J. Smith

In the 14th-16th centuries, a little-known book format, now called the girdle book, was used throughout Europe. The girdle book is distinguished by a cover that extends beyond the book, ending in a knot, hook or ring, or ungathered. The book was hung from the belt with its head down, so when swung up it could be read without detaching it from the belt. Today there are only twenty-six known examples in collections. The Medieval Girdle Book is the first thorough historical study and examination of all so-far known girdle books.

Paper Updates

Many Marbers are still in search of a suitable paper, mostly watercolor marblers. The over buffering with calcium carbonate seems to affect us more than acrylic marblers, for whatever chemical reasons — I haven’t the time to analyze or figure out. I go more by whether it works or doesn’t.

The effect of too much calcium carbonate buffer I can tell right after applying the alum: the paper should taste sweet after alum is applied, and after the paper dries with the alum on it. I usually line dry over night, and if the paper tastes sweet, I know it will work. If it doesn’t, it means the alum was neutralized to some degree or fully, and chances are the paint will run off... though in a rare case, it can still work. However, I prefer a paper that tastes definitely sweet, and I just know that will work.

Many papers that have worked for us — and I hear the same story from just about all the marblers I know — have come and gone. I have used many brands over 40 years that worked, and then didn’t. When I called the company technicians, the answer always was...oh yes, we added more calcium carbonate. How much is too much? Some seems to be fine, but when the PH goes over 8, I (and others as well) usually get “run-off” issues. Sometimes if a paper is borderline, you can work with it damp, and not aluming and stacking too many at a time, maybe enough for a half hour or so till it may go a bit off.

So I have of late tried Light Impressions’ Renaissance Papers. They are unbuffered and work wonderfully. And are reasonably priced, so you don’t cry every time you ruin a “fine art paper” that costs $2.00 to $5.00 per sheet! I always ruin a few... or more... so it is not as much a tragedy if you kill one of these sheets! I still use the Dick Blick brand of sulphite paper if the weather is cool, and that is really inexpensive. But it failed me this past hot muggy summer, but then worked again when it got cool! That is a mystery, but I have noticed that marbling overall likes cool weather better.

Renaissance is my new favorite paper. May I suggest BUY A LOT of whatever you find that works. Don’t assume a paper will never change formulas and stop working. I like to keep a backlog of 500 papers at least, so that if something changes, I have time to find another paper.

Happy New Year, marble a lot, it is fun!

We’ve moved! But we still offer the same reliable service, with increased inventory of exceptional and unique Japanese bookbinding fabrics.

Tokujyo, Asa, Tsumugi, Shark, Tokusei, Shantung, Saifu, Mohair & Ginga

Remember, you need this cloth more than we do.

NOTICE from MP Bogan, Standards Committee:
Resolve to “Attend Standards 2018”

Happy New Year everyone! I’ve made a few resolutions for the coming year, which I’m told need to be as specific as possible. Instead of the generic “Read more” or “Improve health”, my goals are measurable: “Read 12 books. Read the New Yorker magazine before the next one arrives. Do yoga once, swim twice and walk three times every week. Learn to play pedal steel guitar.” It’s January 2 and so far so good! Only time will tell how it goes though, and I’m not totally optimistic.

I did set one other specific goal though—just to be safe: “Travel to Minneapolis this October for Standards”. I know it’s a gimme, kind of like adding an already-completed task to the to-do list, but I added it anyway. And if you are able, I recommend that you do the same. You’ll be glad you did, and in any case, it will help you fulfill another goal and resolution: “Be good to yourself.”

Wishing you all a safe, healthy and happy new year and I look forward to seeing you in Minneapolis!
